LIFE BATTLE ON A ROOF. Early risers in New York Tuesday morning, along the lower end of Avenue B, saw two men in a life and death struggle on the roof of a four-story building. One was James Kine, who was crazy, and who had a few minutes before shot his friend, Robert Parezo, and put two bullets into his own head; the other was Frank Blass, who was endeavoring to capture him. The men tossed and rolled to the edge of the GEO. E. PRICE&GEO. H. RICHARDS | roof, gripping at each other's throats, hanging for an instant half over the roof. Finally the madman was con-

> Kine is a piano-maker, 31 years old. For more than a year he has lived with his brother-in-law, Robert Parezo. He occupied a small room adjoining the apartments of Mr. and Mrs. Parezo on the top, or fourth floor of the building. He had been out of work for months, and was unable to pay his room rent, and he could not live at the house of his sister, Mrs. Sarah Begloff, because she would not have him around. Parezo who makes a fair living at mason work, was generous enough not to turn

Kine out of his room.

Mrs. Parezo had noticed that Kine was acting strangely. Occasionally he would drop into the rooms, and would cut slips of paper and count them over and over again. When questions were asked his small black eyes would shine wildly, and he would refuse to answer. All of his talk was in one vein. He bemoaned his peverty, and cursed the world for not furnishing him with riches. He went in and out of his room at all times of day and night, and some-times returned drunk, although he was not a hard drinker.

As the weeks went by Mr. and Mrs. Parezo and Mrs. Begloff noticed that the glitter in Kine's eyes grew fiercer, and that he seemed more melancholy than ever. Kine was in his room at 6 o'clock that morning when Parezo left to purchase groceries for breakfast. The hallway was half-lighted, and Parezo did not see the door of Kine's room open. He was about to turn the stairway when he heard Kine's voice call: "Hold on there!"

Parezo did not have time to turn or DOOR AND WINDOW FRAMES, MOULD to answer. There was the report of a revolver, and Parezo felt the sting of a bullet in his back. He fell at the head of the stairway, moaning: "My God! am shot."

Before Mrs. Parezo could get from her bed to the hallway, Kine had re-turned to the open door of his room, and was swinging a heavy revolver. She rushed past him to her husband, and helped him to his feet. As they descended the steps Kine shut the door of his room. Two more shots were heard. By this time the people in the house were aroused, and were assisting Mrs. Parezo to care for her husband.

Then Kine appeared at the head of the stairs, partly dressed. The blood was pouring in streams from two wounds in his head, and was spattering over his clothing. Kine returned to his room. Frank Blass, a milkman, saw the blood covered face of Kine looking through the window. He called to Henry Schilling, a newsdeal-er, and the two men pressed through the crowd in front of the house and went upstairs. As they reached the top story Kine darted from his room a few feet ahead of them and went up a ladder to the roof. Blass, carrying a heavy driver's whip, followed, and Schilling stopped at the roof. The people, 40 feet below, saw Kine dancing on the roof like a madman. As he approached the edge the blood spurted from his wounds to the walk below. Behind him was Blass, awaiting an opportunity to seize him. Twice Kine reached the edge of the roof and spread out his arms, as if to jump. Each time he retreated. A dozen people were gathered about the scuttle, but a rordinary ourner and not one went to the assistance of Blass, who was slowly creeping forward to catch the madman.

Finally, as Kine moved for the third time toward the roof Blass seized him by the back of the neck. Kine half turned, and in a flash the men were struggling on the roof. They tumbled and tossed about, moving closer to the edge fronting on Avenue B. Both are stocky men and are well matched physically. As they moved closer to the edge of the roof it seemed as if the madman was gaining decided advantage. A shout arose from the crowd in the street: "He's going to push him over!"

A big clot of blood marks the corner of the roof where the last struggle took place. Blass, after being pushed face over the edge, and in such a position purposes.

to drop.
When Kine staggered forward to renew the fight Blass brought the but end of the whip down over his head. Kine fell as though hit by an iron beam. He moaned and cried that he had had Blass, with face and clothing covered with blood from Kine's wounds, stood guard over him until the arrival of a policeman. The crowd in the street breathed once more, and gave a shout of praise for Blass's nerve and Parezo were taken to Bellevue Hospital in the same ambulance. Both were conscious, but neither said a word to the other. It was found that the bullet had entered Parezo's back below the fifth rib. It was not thought that the wound was dangerous, and he was taken to his home. The bullet was not removed. Kine has a bullet in his head in front of the temple. The MEDICINAL.
